

Thank you to our frontline workers

The coronavirus hit Ireland in February 2020 and on 12th March the government decided to shut all schools to try and stop the spread of the disease. On 24th March almost almost all businesses closed but there were some workers that had to continue to go to work. These were our frontline workers and included doctors, nurses, hospital workers, bus drivers, supermarket workers and binmen.

I am very grateful to all these people who helped keep the country safe and keep all the essential services running. It must have been very scary for them. I think Ireland has done a good job in controlling the virus and I tried to do my bit by staying at home and keeping my hands clean. Some countries have had a lot more cases than Ireland and my uncle Juanpe and my aunt Santi are doctors in Spain, which was hit very badly with the virus. They work in a hospital in the south of Spain.
